The White Plan. The Comte Chambord may after all be white flag. The London Times aaya:

'M. Desjardines has written a pamphlet in which he contends up France had no national fing, but that every regiment had its own standard la consequence of the tax on rice. There was a serious conflict, with loss of life, be-decorated with a white badge, the old Huguenot symbol which was adopted by Hanry IV. As for the white cornet, which he regards as the ancestor of the white fing, it was introduced in the middle of the sinteenth century as a sign of asperior command, llut Charles IX and Henry IV were the only kings who used it, though up to the Revolution every colonel was entitled to display it. The cockade varied in different regiments hut in 1767 the infantry received a white cockade, and under Louis XVI it was entended to the cavairy. 'In the navy both blue and red were originally holated then blue alone: while Louis XVI re served the white flag for his own vesses allowing the merchant vessels, however to employ it coulded with some distinctive badge. in the eighteenth century merchant vessels usually adopted the white flag. The colors of l'aris, red and blue, displayed after the fall of the Bas tille, formed, in conjunction with the white cockade of the troops, the tricolor rockade, and the colors becoming tional were transferred to the flags. M. Desjardine intimates that the Emigree and Vendeans were mistaken in regard-ing the white flag as the ensign of Henry IV. The Legitimists, however, cite the authority of Favyn, 1620, who mentioned the white cornet as the national color, and Beneton, 1739, who gives still more emphatic testimony to the same effect. They also appeal to Lafayette's 'Memoirs,' which state that he proposed the tricolor instead of the blue and red, because the latter formed the Orleans plize the old French color, white, by combining it with the colors of the Rev. olation. They urge also that even after the tricolor was adopted for the cockade the white flag was unfurled above the King in the Assembly in 1790, and was retained by coioneis of regiments till 1791; while the Assembly, in decreeing in 1790 that the tricolor should be adopted by the navy, distinctly recited that the white fing had up to that time been the naval ensign. The Journal Officiel and the Orleans Soliel aide with M. Desjardins, while the Union insista that the Counte de Chambord was under no mistaka in nailing the white flag to the mast. The former would fain prove the tricolor to be of older date than lte competitor, for they maintain that the French arms under Louis XIV showed three fleur-de-lys flags-red, white and of St. Paul, Minn., the heroine of a nice sentimental soem. Her story is not a long one, but there are novel points about it, and it is proof that "it's love that makes the world go 'round." Some time ago Maggie became engaged to a young man in St. Paul, moving in her own so-cial circle, and one she loved fondly, as he secured to deserve. Maggie had done noticing wrong, but she had an enemy in the person of a young man who have been an unsuccessful suitor, and he hurt her as a woman can always be luct, though chaste as Hiana. He put in circulation certain stories about Maggie engagoment : an l Maggle, poor girl, lost her reason, and was placed in the taken to the insane asylam. Meanwhile, the employers of the young man to whon he crazed girl was engaged heard of the case, and ascertained that there was no foundation for the stories affecting Maggie's character, and they proposed to right the matter, if possible. The young man, absent ou a basiness trip, was sent for, and was only too glad to learn of his error. It was resolved that Maggie's a thing being possible has never occurred; —still it is the uppermost sentiment, estover should see ker, and the hope was and if it does suggest itself it is dismissed pecially if the object of her love is her entertained that the interview might aid in restoring her reason. The poor girl's tkings had all been packed, and a carriage cognized by the sheriff to convay her to the deput. He was induced to postpone the trip, and then the young man went to we the girl he had too rashly forsaken. Wandering in her talk, apprehensions and alarm at the proposilike Ophelia, she was seated in the sheriff's house when her lover entered. In an instant, the meaningless prattle ceased, reason came to the clouded brain through that beat of ail avenues, the heart, and

We, therefore, as a supporter of the Republican party and a friend of the President, beg leave to say a few words to the latter, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matbeing pocketed by intermediate agents, we print what we have to say. There is a person in Washington known as Gov. Shepherd, who has a very bad reputation throughout the country. This person is regarded as the head of the gang who are known to have " improved " the City of Washington at an enormous cost to the public, and, as is generally be lieved, with profit to themselves. That the public are awindled by the so-called Ring is now generally believed.

One feature of President Grant's character, fully as prominent as any other, in change of children hy an unscrupulous a disposition to stand hy his friends, and nurse has often been the basis of sensato take care of his wounded. This is, in itself commendable, but it may be carried too far, and a person may often treat persons as his friends who are in reality his enemies. In this respect President Grant has, in our opinion, made many mistakes. Notably in the mistake that proved seriously injurious to himself position. It was much to the interest of personally, and to the party he repre-

The Soke, we diwrille.

Says Livingstone, in his last journal, just published: "The soko often goes erect, but places the hand on the head, as if to steady the body. When seen thus the soko is an ungainly beast. The most scutimental young lady would not call him a 'slear,' but a bandy-legged, not-hellied, low-booking villain, withma particle of the gentleman in him Other animals, especially the antelopes are graceful, and it is pleasant to sethem, either at rest ar in mutien; the untives, too, are well made, lithe, and comely to behold, but the soko, if large, would do well to stand for a picture the devil. He takes away my appetite ly his discusting bestiality of appear mee. His light yellow face shows his ugly whiskers and faint apology for a beard; the forelicad villamously low, with high ears, is well in the background of the great dog mouth; the teeth are slightly human, but the canines show the beast by their large development. The hands, or rather the fingers, are like those of the natives. The fiesh of the feet is yellow, and the eagerness with which the Manyuema devoues It leaves the impression that eating sokos was the first stage by which they arrived at being cannibuls. ROADS AND ROAD-MAKING.-There is nn nne subject to the farmer living in the prairie region of the west, of mure imearth roads. First, because it enables him to get his produce to market at about hall the cost of handing over indifferent or had roads, and because continuous roads, the grades of which extend over the light swells of the prairies as well as the valleys, drain a irge amount of territory, because continneus earth roads make continuous places which might not be otherwise practicalde.

Another reason why roads should one of the first things attempted in opening up a setttlement is, that it adds so lightly to the cost of the farms per acre, and so surely increases the value of the land, when the mails are fluished. The wonder is, that this important fact has never occurred to, or at least licen arted on by communities, as one of the first things to be undertaken.

It is true that under the nid system making roads with the spade and shovel, or with the plow and scraper, especially in awkward hands, the cost of really good roadways would often exceed the value of the land, and hence the reason, keeping. we suppose, why so little al the kind le attempted. Without roads there can be no civillzation. Hence, one of the first efforts of the ploneer is, and should be, the open-ing of roads. These too often, however, remain for decades, little more than tracks worn in the soil by the wheels of wagens, with now and then a bail slough partially turnpiked, with perhaps here and there an uncouth sluice way across the lowest places, but without any pro-vision for draining of the accumulated water beyond. The rains of spring and fall wear these tracks upon the slopes into gullies, until at last, as we have often seen, the whole road is abandoned and a new track is selected.

A continuous graded road over the undulations and valleys would have allowed the water to have run continuously to the side ditches, as it should; the track would have become smooth and hard, so that teams could have hauled heavy loads, except perhaps for a short time in the spring, when the frost was coming out of the earth, and a little
